

It may have gone quiet – but it's not gone away...

The General Data Protection Regulation (GDPR) became law on 25 May, but it did so without much fuss. After the flurry of emails from companies asking if they could stay in touch, it all went quiet, and we could be forgiven for thinking nothing has really changed.

But it has.

The UK Data Protection Act is now law, and that means company directors and managers have a responsibility to make sure they handle personal data correctly and respect the privacy of those whose information they hold.

Companies must be able to show they have a legal, documented basis on which to process data.

They must be able to show that they have robust processes and policies that safeguard any data they hold.

And they need to make sure that their IT systems are secure and designed to protect personal data and respect the rights of individuals.

Accordio Ltd can advise businesses not just on how to stay within the rules but on how to make GDPR work for them. While complying with the legislation is vital, taking this opportunity to streamline your data can pay huge dividends in terms of efficiency and sales.

Led by Rob Neil, who has 20 years' experience at a senior level in data protection and information governance, Accordio has the tools to transform your business while helping you stay on the right side of legislation.
